Dear Concerned Parties:

Percy Whitmore has been a patient of mine for almost ten years. Mr. Whitmore has experienced severe depression while under my care. The symptoms include chronic fatigue syndrome and a feeling of anxiety rendering him unable to perform effective cognitive functions. Preliminary attempts to address the problem served only to exacerbate it, making it necessary to attempt a combination of medicines and treatments that have proven more successful.

At present Mr. Whitmore is being treated for his depression with medications that appear to be addressing his medical needs. It is important to note that during this time Mr. Whitmore was in the process of launching his own business and the depression seriously hampered that attempt, leaving him incapable to addressing vital concerns, specifically deadlines for submission of necessary paperwork.

The problems were not only mental – Mr. Whitmore underwent treatment for prostate cancer, which weakened his immune system, his stamina, and his desire to succeed. For the past few months Mr. Whitmore has shown a distinct improvement both physically and mentality, and is now able to assume the responsibilities he abandoned during his illness. I believe that Mr. Whitmore is finally ready to pick up where he left off.
